

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO UNIVERSITY CALENDAR: "STUDENT CONDUCT"

The traditional purposes of a university are freedom of inquiry and freedom of expression. Simon Fraser University was founded on these principles. The University does not assume parental obligations nor responsibilities, but relies on the home training and good sense of the student in matters of personal conduct. Students are reminded, however, that they are bound during their attendance to live in accordance with University regulations and civil law, which apply to academic standards and University property, the respect of personal liberty and property, and the public laws of the Province.

STUDENT CONDUCT

The University does not assume parental obligations or responsibilities, but relies on the good sense and home training of the student in matters of personal conduct. The University will uphold freedom of inquiry and freedom of expression. Students are reminded, however, that they are expected to behave in accordance with University regulations concerning academic standards and University property, and that they are bound during their attendance by the public laws of the Province and Dominion.
