The Dialogue Institute

Strategic Plan

Purpose

Dialogue is a process of collaborative listening and learning to discover meanings among diverse participants. If respectful, this dialogic process gives recognition to sources of agreement and disagreement around complex issues. Dialogue is thus a special form and method of engagement with others, as well as a commitment to listen and communicate without condition. An emerging interest in dialogue-related research and education has been identified in a growing number of disciplines including communication, philosophy, sociology, business, political science and education.

The purpose of the Dialogue Institute is to promote the study and practice of dialogue within and outside the University. The Institute is the University's centre for research and education with respect to the Morris J. Wosk Centre for Dialogue. It will provide a focus for academic activity associated with the Centre for Dialogue and will be the point of contact for affiliated institutions, organizations and individuals.

Governance

The charter and constitution of the Institute provide for an appointed Director and a Steering Committee, reporting to the Vice-President, Research (see attached).

Steering Committee

The membership of the existing Academic Advisory Committee, appointed by the Vice President Academic for a two-year term, is as follows:

Robert Anderson (Chair) Professor, School of Communication to 09/01/03
Len Berggren, Professor, Mathematics, to 09/01/03
Joan Collinge, Director, Centre for Distance Education to 01/01/03

Mark Wexler, Professor, Faculty of Business Administration to 01/01/05
Yosef Wosk, Director, Interdisciplinary Studies, Continuing Studies to 01/01/05

It is intended that the University will appoint these individuals as Members of the Steering Committee of the Institute. The Academic Advisory Committee would then dissolve. Additional appointments may be recommended to the Administrative Officer.

Activities

Research

An emerging interest in dialogue-related research and education has been identified in a growing number of disciplines including communication, philosophy, sociology, business, political science, anthropology, and education. The study of dialogue thus has diverse intellectual roots. As a commitment to communicate without condition, a special form of engagement, and collaborative listening and learning – dialogue can be studied and understood through a kind of conceptual and empirical synthesis from different perspectives.

The Institute will study and evaluate dialogues that are planned and held in the Centre for Dialogue— analyzing, for example, the best composition of large groups, the staging of issues and timing of interventions, the placement and role of key speakers, and the flow and interruption of dialogue. Dialogue is an ancient form of communication and each tradition around the world approaches it in different ways. Members of the Institute will study both the pragmatics of actual dialogues and the tradition and theory of dialogue. The evaluation of dialogues will provide insight for training and improved planning of further dialogues. It will also enable the Institute to use this empirical data to build theory to meet new situations.

Graduate students will be trained through Internships and their experience of dialogue will provide the basis for theses and dissertations in various departments. This research program will link the Institute with experts inside and outside the University involved in specific issues raised by the Dialogue Forum and Symposium (see below). Institute Associates, Fellows, and Steering Committee members will be particularly involved in these linkages. The Research Partnerships described above are key to the evolution of this program, because international exchange of research findings and interpretations is essential to the development of the field.

Community Outreach and Public Programming

The Institute will be not only the means to sustain on-going relationships between the University and its communities; but also a window through which members of the public unaware of the Centre can learn about it and use it. Through activities outside the Centre, as well as within it, the Institute will foster an understanding of dialogue and its practical applications. The Dialogue Forum (see below) is designed to encompass five community-based dialogues, which will provide opportunities for observation, testing of principles and reporting. Student interns will be engaged in this process as well as faculty. Faculty will also be involved in the design of each forum, which will incorporate current theoretical research (i.e., in tourism) and its application to specific situations (i.e., the Olympic bid and difficult community consultations).

Dialogue Forum

The immediate objective of the Forum is to create effective processes to facilitate dialogue that leads to action and to test these processes in specific issue-driven conversations. These processes can then lead to strategic decision-making. This is a continuing Forum for reflection on practice and the dissemination of cumulative experience and analysis through publication and public gatherings.

The Dialogue Forum, initiated in September 2001, convened a gathering of senior executives, professionals, and academics who brought a diversity of experience in the dialogue process. Together, the group described situations requiring resolution, addressed the state of practice currently available and identified gaps in knowledge and practice. In 2002 the findings of the Dialogue Forum will be tested in five dialogues: tourism; mining; transportation and land use; Canadian youth; and, quality in health care. The results will be reported and reviewed continuously throughout the year and the initial group will reconvene in September 2002. The Dialogue Forum is intended to be foundational to the development of the Dialogue Institute.

Dialogue Symposium

The 2002 Dialogue Symposium will be a one-year later follow-up to the Symposium on Dialogue and Negotiation. The 2001 Symposium opened the Centre for Dialogue and was oriented to dialogue professionals. This Symposium is to be an annual event, with three functions: 1) a research-oriented invitational consultation on research and methods; 2) a wide symposium for dialogue and negotiation professionals; and 3) a public event in the Centre reporting on progress on examples of dialogue previously presented and discussed. The plan is to hold this Symposium in the summer, annually.

Through interaction, experts outside the university and Simon Fraser University faculty will develop collaborative research and development projects, and these proposals will be placed before SSHRC, foundations, and other funding agencies.

Credit Courses connected with the Institute

The Semester in Dialogue is an interdisciplinary undergraduate semester for a cohort of exceptional students, designed to develop collaborative learning and problem solving across disciplines. The Institute and this credit semester have complementary objectives, and there is opportunity for mutually supportive activity, including the role of Dialogue Semester students in projects of the Institute.

Negotiation and Dialogue as Communication is a course (CMNS 447) taught regularly by Robert Anderson in the School of Communication. At the heart of the course is a framework for analysis of negotiation and dialogue in situations of conflict. In addition, a series of guests enables students to engage with experienced professionals who are involved with dialogue and negotiation. These guests will also be involved in other aspects of the Institute's work. There is additionally a graduate course (CMNS 855) on Negotiation and Dialogue, also taught by Robert Anderson.

Professional Development

A model for a series of professional development courses aimed at improving practice in a range of settings will be developed through the Institute and will provide a source of revenue and further partnerships with practicing professionals.

This kind of training will focus on the themes of the dialogues carried forward from the Dialogue Forum and Symposium, namely how difficult issues involve parties in adversarial relationships, how methods of dialogue must prevail over and through these difficulties, and how parties can find meaning and value in difficult conversations. Professional education seminars will form part of a revenue source for the Institute.

Publications

The Institute will develop a website with an interactive discussion forum on research and education and a strategy for publications in popular and academic publications. The Dialogue Institute has a plan for its website that will include an interactive portal as well as an archive of academic papers arising from the work of the Institute and a record of dialogues that have occurred there. It will be a source of information and a place for discussion of issues and experience. It will connect individuals and organizations engaged in dialogue on important issues to others and to sources of support for their work.

In conjunction with the CBC, the Institute also plans to develop collaborative projects to engage Canadians in discussion on important current issues. In addition, a series of reports and publications is envisioned. Faculty involved in the Undergraduate Semester in Dialogue will disseminate information about the project through educational publications, at conferences and popular media.

Specific publications will include: the annual Dialogue Report; Guidelines for Convening, Moderating and Closing a Dialogue; the Dialogue Continuum: Understanding the Terms of Engagement for Important Conversations; Determining Success: How to Evaluate the Outcomes of a Dialogue; Dialogue Watch; an on-line monthly commentary on world-wide dialogues; proceedings of the annual Dialogue and Negotiation Symposium; Reports of the Dialogue Forum.

Presentations

The Director and Fellows will present work developed at the Institute at professional meetings, and will speak to community organizations.

Sources of Funding

Funding is being sought from foundations, granting agencies, and through project funding. A grant from the Canadian Pacific Charitable Foundation for the Dialogue Forum, which is a project of the Institute, for example, has provided partial funding for a research associate and secretarial support. Start up funding of $10,000 will be provided by the Vice President Academic in year one and an additional $10,000 considered in year two, if necessary, but the business plan predicts sustainability in year three.
