Here is the Library Report regarding the proposed Centre for Restorative Justice.

I've read over the proposal the Centre for Restorative Justice and I am satisfied that the Library can support this Centre. I had two concerns that I spoke with Robert Gordon about and he has clarified the following:

1. In the three year plan for the Centre it states that in Phase Two a second undergraduate course in restorative justice was to be added to the curriculum: Criminology 442: Correctional Practice: Advanced Topics. It appeared to me that this was a new course but in fact it has been offered for three semesters. There is no need to do a course assessment for this course.
2. In Phase Three a Chair in Restorative Justice will be established. This is still in the fundraising stage. Often with new faculty members there are new directions for a Centre. Robert has assured me that any likely impact on the Library by this new faculty member will come in the guise of new courses. As we have a procedure in place to review library materials for new courses I'm satisfied that we can determine any further necessary library resources at that time.

Future requests for materials to support this Centre will be borne by the existing Library book and periodical budgets assigned to Criminology. Any request for materials will be handled under existing procedures.

Costs:

THERE ARE NO ADDITIONAL LIBRARY COSTS ASSOCIATED WITH STARTING THIS CENTRE

John, I am now prepared to make a recommendation to the University's Governing Committee for Centres that a Centre for Restorative Justice (documentation attached) be established and that it be classified as a Schedule 'A' Centre. As you are aware, I asked Rob Gordon for clarification on a number of issues which he has provided to my satisfaction. I believe the Centre will become an important research node and focal point for fundraising.

CENTRE FOR RESTORATIVE JUSTICE

Terms of Reference

The Centre for Restorative Justice at SFU

The Centre for Restorative Justice will provide a focal point for faculty, students and community members to explore a broad range of restorative justice issues. Housed in the School of Criminology, the Centre will establish and maintain facilities, materials, personnel and other resources dedicated to the study, teaching and practice of restorative justice.

The Centre's initial objectives are:

- to conduct research on restorative justice and related programmes and practices
- to provide restorative justice programme development and evaluation services
- to develop and provide educational services—particularly courses, seminars and workshops on restorative justice topics
- to co-ordinate and host conferences, including the October 2000 inauguration and subsequent annual hosting of the Ron Wiebe Memorial Lecture Series
- to invite and host visiting speakers, scholars and researchers
- to establish and develop collaborative partnerships with community and government organizations that practice, study or develop restorative justice methods
- to implement and maintain an online clearinghouse for research and other resources on restorative justice through expansion of the Centre's existing Internet site
- to establish a Chair of Restorative Justice funded by an endowment
- to develop special cohort programmes to encourage Aboriginal graduate students to attend the Centre and study restorative justice
- to explore and develop feminist initiatives in the fields of restorative justice and violence against women and children

Restorative Justice

Restorative justice is a philosophy. Guided by the fundamental assumption that crime causes harm to individuals, communities and society, restorative justice encourages and facilitates reparation of that harm. While there are a growing number of techniques and practices emerging within a restorative justice framework, five principle objectives unite these efforts. These principles are: to invite full participation; to heal what has been broken; to seek full and direct accountability; to unite or reunite what is or has been divided; and to strengthen communities, thereby preventing further harm.¹

Restorative justice is participatory. Victims, offenders, communities, government and individuals work together to create innovative solutions that meet the needs of persons and communities affected by crime. The participation of offenders and victims is essential to the process, and it is important to invite and encourage participation from families, members of the community, civic, and state organizations. Rather than administering punishment for violating laws, restorative justice facilitates the creation, reparation, and strengthening of social relationships. The result is often greater satisfaction for all parties and greater harmony within and across communities.

Advocates and practitioners of restorative justice acknowledge that our conventional justice system leaves much to be desired. It is adversarial, unwieldy, complex and expensive, and it allows little participation from those most directly involved with, and affected by, the acts that mobilize it. Restorative justice provides and promotes alternatives to these conventional measures.

The Need for the Centre

The Centre for Restorative Justice will be the only Canadian university-based organization dedicated to the study, development and practice of restorative justice. In an environment where an increasing number of restorative justice programmes are being developed and endorsed across civic and government organizations, the Centre will play an important role as a venue, resource base and partner for sharing restorative justice knowledge and expertise. Assessing and documenting the effectiveness and applicability of restorative justice methods, and sharing our experiences and data with others will advance the principles of restorative justice here and beyond; now and in the future.

Canada is home to many Aboriginal communities, some of which offer unique and valuable models for community-oriented conflict resolution and reparation consistent with a restorative justice philosophy. Aboriginal communities and practices present an opportunity to learn, share and build upon restorative justice methods. The Centre for Restorative Justice will support these communities and their efforts, thereby contributing to the development and practice of restorative justice, the strengthening of Aboriginal communities and the preservation of Canada's unique cultural heritage.

Client Base

The Centre will serve a broad client base ranging from interested individuals through civic and government organizations within Canada and internationally. Among the Centre's current and anticipated clientele are organizations based on faith, victimization, offending, policing, corrections, ethnicity, education and prison justice. Interested members of the public will include students, advocates, Aboriginal persons, victims and offenders.

Revision of These Terms

The members of the Centre for Restorative Justice will revisit, revise and re-endorse these Terms of Reference on an annual basis and/or more frequently upon election.

Structure, Membership and Governance of the Centre

The Centre for Restorative Justice will be housed in the School of Criminology, Faculty of Arts, at Simon Fraser University. The Centre will be administered by a Steering Committee made up of five Simon Fraser University faculty members and three representatives from the community, each to be appointed by the Dean of Arts for a term of three years. The faculty members of the Steering Committee will be drawn from the School of Criminology. The Director of the Centre will be appointed by the Dean upon recommendation by the Steering Committee.

Upon recommendation of the Steering Committee of the Centre, the Dean may appoint individuals from the University and the community as Associate Members of the Centre. Associate Members will be invited to attend the Centre's Annual General Meetings and may work with members of the Steering Committee on projects undertaken by the Centre.
