INTERNATIONAL ACADEMIC EXCHANGE AGREEMENTS

Academic arrangements which cross international borders take many forms. Individual faculty members pursue their scholarly interests with colleagues in other countries, students seek access to programs offered in foreign institutions, and universities take part in development aid programs that involve their less privileged sister institutions abroad.

While these arrangements vary in kind and in scope, there are two categories of international academic relationships that share similar characteristics -- Exchange Agreements and Student Mobility Programs. Such arrangements are based on written agreements. Unlike affiliations where one institution clearly dominates the academic relationship, Exchange Agreements are based on the principles of partnership, mutual benefit and reciprocity.

Since 1983, Simon Fraser University has entered into a growing number of exchange arrangements with overseas partners. Their distinguishing characteristics are set out below and a list of partner institutions is attached.

Exchange Agreements

Exchange Agreements provide mutual benefits. Activities within an agreement may include: exchange of students, both graduate and undergraduate; exchange of faculty members for teaching and research; collaborative research; consultancies; workshops, seminars, conferences; exchange of materials and publications; access to fellowships, scholarships, research associateships, tuition waivers; and study tours.

At SFU, field schools are being established as a self-funding component of some Exchange Agreements. SFU students are given instruction by faculty members from both SFU and the partner university, at a venue located in the partner university's country. Students are assessed tuition fees at the SFU rate, but the money raised is deemed payable to the overseas partner institution. These funds are held in trust at SFU and are made available to bring students and faculty from the partner institution to Canada. In this way, a significant portion of the program is self-funding.

Exchange Agreements of this kind depend for their success on disciplinary "champions" within the two universities. The shared interests of computer scientists at SFU and the University of East Anglia is a case in point. Where Exchange Agreements are entered into without a disciplinary focus, they tend to collapse due to a lack of academic vitality. The abandoned relationship with Jinan University falls into this class.

Student Mobility Programs

Student Mobility Programs limit the exchange primarily to undergraduate students, although graduate students may be included within their terms of reference. Like more comprehensive academic exchange agreements, Student Mobility programs require a formal, institutional undertaking. An agreement may be university-wide or may cover only one department. Agreements usually provide for fee payment either at the home or the host institution and may include fee reciprocity, a reciprocal or unilateral fee waiver, or a differential fee waiver. Many agreements stipulate a one-for-one exchange and some agreements limit the number of students accepted from the partner institution. Generally speaking, there is an interest on the part of the sending institution to have its students receive part of their degree completion credits at an overseas university.
