At the Senate meeting on September 13, 2010, there was a friendly amendment approved that the wording in the document, regarding admission to “home” university, be resolved before the motion goes to the Board of Governors for approval.

Concern was expressed over the following statement, “students with Chinese citizenship who wish to join the GDDP programs must first apply for admission at ZU.” The issue was raised that if a student had dual citizenship, then according to that statement they must first apply to ZU as the “home” university. In reality, students are required to apply for admission to each university regardless of citizenship.

The wording under the category of admission has been changed to say, “Students must first be admitted to one institution, and then apply, and be admitted to the other institution. To qualify for admission to the GDDP programs, students must satisfy the usual admission requirements specified by each university. The university of first-admission will be referred to as the student’s “home” university. Students with SFU as their home university are called SFU students and students with ZU as their home university are called ZU students below.” The revised papers reflect this change.
