Dear Dr. McTaggart-Cowan:

The Education Committee of the Canadian Mental Health Association's British Columbia Division is concerned about the lack of mandatory courses in mental health offered by the teacher training faculties in our Universities.

When this was brought to the attention of the Board of Directors, they directed me to write to the Senate of each University to request that the present courses as they relate to mental health, be reviewed by the appropriate bodies at the Universities. Such reviews would determine the courses that a student has to have during teacher training now and, we hope, would result in changing present optional courses into mandatory ones.

We are certain that you appreciate both the importance of having the teacher as well equipped as possible to handle the mild manifestations of emotional turmoil in children and the value of her being able to determine when a child needs professional help.

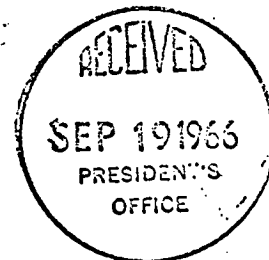

We are aware of the extreme shortage of mental health personnel in the community to whom a harassed teacher can refer a child, and our Association is conducting a continuous social action program for more training courses and better salaries.

The leadership that the Faculties of Education can give in initiating their own programs now need not wait for the results of this campaign.

The Canadian Mental Health Association therefore urges you to review your present mandatory mental health courses in your teacher training programs with a view to increasing these requirements to an appropriate level.

Respectfully yours,

George Kenwood
