Contemporary Issues and New Developments in Educational Practice

May - June 1997

"Education in our present context is not viewed as separate from 'the real world' but is integrally woven into the wider societal framework."

Ministry of Education, 1990.

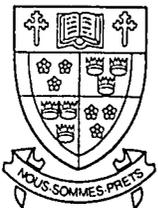

This course is designed for certified teachers and administrators who wish to focus on current trends and relevant research that influence the changing face of teaching and learning. Potential topics include brain/health research, curriculum/instruction/resource development, media/technology influences, school design and organization, family/community/cultural change, risk/success factors, and the demands of the social/political context of education.

Current leaders in education and other partner groups will be invited to share their perspectives, and each class participant will have the opportunity to meet with an expert in his/her field of interest.

Teachers and administrators currently working on research may find this course a useful way to prepare their work for publication. Teachers working toward degree completion or post baccalaureate diplomas may want to explore whether this course fits into their programs. New teachers and PDP students may find this course a relevant foundational study.

Educators who have not attended SFU before are welcome to register if they meet university calendar admission requirements (GPA 2.0)

This course is not on telephone-registration, so please call 291-5830 for admission information and registration.
