	French Major with a Concentration for Prospective Teachers

Dear Dr. Pulkingham,

The Department of French is seeking approval of a Concentration for prospective teachers within the existing French Major. The Concentration involves primarily language and culture, with elements of linguistics and literature, drawing on the unique characteristics and strengths of the Department of French. The Concentration is, at the same time, distinct from the standard major. It includes a compulsory semester away, either in France (Tours) or Québec (Sherbrooke). At the upper-division level, the required courses and the electives have been selected for their relevancy in method or content for prospective teachers. The Department Curriculum Committee and the Department as a whole have approved the proposal. A flow chart of the Concentration and a course map or pathway are attached for a full view of student navigation through the program.

RATIONALE

This program is unique in Western Canada. It is designed to prepare students for teaching through a combination of language, culture and education courses as well as a set of related requirements and electives in linguistics and literature. With its semester away, the Concentration offers students immersion in a Francophone setting where language gains can be consolidated while studying key components of teaching.

The program, as conceived, fills an important need in the eyes of the Dean of the Faculty of Education, Dr. Magnusson:

"This proposed Concentration goes a long way towards addressing a structural deficit we have in admitting students to French education streams within PDP; we are often scrambling to find language-qualified students for admission, even though their job prospects on graduation are excellent. For this reason alone, I would be supportive."

Moreover, the proposal corresponds to the Province's expressed desire for well-trained teachers in the area of French language education.

The Concentration will act as a bridge for students who plan to enter the PDP-French Module in the Faculty of Education. The courses will help equip students for classroom life (including the virtual one) with a variety of topics related to the practical, social and professional dimensions of education. In particular, theoretical and methodological aspects of Second Language teaching will be explored throughout the Concentration, while attention will also go toward developing a high level of proficiency in French.

A substantial number of students majoring in French intend to become teachers. The creation of the French Major with a Concentration for Prospective Teachers will prepare students for the Professional Development Program (PDP)-French Module and a career in teaching, be it in French Immersion, Core French, Intensive French or the Programme francophone.

Stephen Steele Associate Professor and Chair Department of French

Dec. 1, 2014

Dear Dr. Steele,

Thank you for forwarding the proposal and supporting documents for a French Major with a Concentration for Prospective Teachers. Within the proposed major students would take 3 Education courses, EDUC 100, and two of EDUC 370, 380 or 382.

I have discussed the proposal with Paul Neufeld, Director of Professional Programs, and we are both excited about this initiative. We think that identifying potential French teachers early in their Arts degrees, and beginning their professional development with the combination of language, culture, and education courses mapped out in your proposal, along with the semester-long immersion experience in Sherbrooke or Tours, could go a long way toward strengthening the pool of applicants to our PDP and PLP French modules.

The only possible challenge I foresee is in meeting enrollment targets. Historically, we have had a hard time meeting minimum enrollments for EDUC 370, 380, and the French offering of 382; however, I also believe that with some strategic marketing, we might be able to attract more students earlier in their programs.

Therefore, Paul and I are both pleased to lend our support in principle to the proposal.

If you would like any clarification about what I have written here, please feel free to contact me by email at ann.chinnerv@sfu.ca or by phone at 778-782-8123.

Sincerely,

Ann Chinnery, Ph.D. Director, Undergraduate Programs
