External Review Update for the Department of Humanities

1.1.1 Undergraduate
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • The department has identified its emerging focus and contribution to the university mission as “critical dialogue in world humanities,” which would draw on the existing Western and Asian focus of the department as separate streams to develop a research and teaching focus on dialogue and common themes within these traditions of the humanities. Several existing members of the department will develop new research and teaching ideas for this stream. (2017) We propose to streamline and integrate the undergraduate curriculum by <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ○ suspending admission of new students into the Asia-Canada Program (summer 2017), while enabling students with declared minors to complete their program and continuing to offer ASC courses that draw strong student enrollments ○ discontinuing the honours degree (as soon as possible) ○ deleting courses that no longer attract strong enrollment (May 2017) ○ examining course titles and revising them to better reflect both course content and 21st century perspectives (May 2017) ○ re-examining the certificate programs (May 2017) ○ arranging for faculty members (rather than sessional instructors) to teach HUM 101 (Spring 2018) ○ developing a new 300-level course that will integrate 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ○ The department integrated “critical dialogue in world humanities” into its most recent five-year plan. Faculty with expertise in East Asia and Europe are working together to open up courses previously focusing exclusively on European cultures in order to provide more opportunities for undergraduates to examine humanities themes across cultures. To date we have streamlined and integrated the undergraduate curriculum by <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ○ suspending admission of new students into the Asia-Canada Program (summer 2017), while enabling students with declared minors to complete their program and continuing to offer ASC courses that draw strong student enrollments ○ discontinuing the honours degree ○ examining course titles and revising them to better reflect our global humanities orientation ○ terminating certificate programs ○ arranging for faculty members (rather than sessional instructors) to teach HUM 101 (Samir Gandesha and Paul Crowe) ○ developing a new 300-level course that will integrate programming offered through the Institute for the Humanities and the J.S. Woodsworth Chair, thereby enabling students to engage in matters of public concern and importance. Eleanor Stebner and Samir Gandesha have been working on this. The task is to be completed by Dr. Gandesha as Dr. Stebner will

<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● In order to better integrate programming at the graduate level <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ○ the department will seriously consider how viable it is to run the MA HUM degree, especially since the MA in Liberal Studies degree exists, and explore how MA students may take courses in the Graduate Liberal Studies program, thereby providing them with a regular learning cohort and also reducing the overload course teaching now experienced by Humanities faculty (May 2017) ○ pending the outcome of the above re-visiting of the MA HUM program, faculty who teach in the World Literature Program will be available to supervise MA Humanities students ○ the department will market our unique, interdisciplinary program as widely as possible to deepen our pool of applicants and ensure that only the best-prepared and capable students who are motivated to complete their degree in a timely manner are admitted 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● In order to better integrate programming at the graduate level <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ○ the department has seriously considered its MA HUM degree and elected to continue with the degree while monitoring faculty workload challenges. We have successfully integrated our past two MA cohorts into the GLS course titled LS 800 which has been helpful in this regard. ○ The Dean's Office is considering relocating LTI and WL within FASS. It is unclear whether their faculty will be available to supervise HUM students. We are however continuing to cooperate with Hellenic Studies who have offered expertise and support to our HUM MA students. We see possibilities for greatly strengthening this relationship. ○ the department continues to take in very few new graduate students due to a need to ensure high quality students who are also sufficiently motivated to complete their degree in a timely manner. We are also mindful of shrinking faculty resources due to retirements and a lack of faculty renewal for ten years.

4. Working Environment <ul style="list-style-type: none"> Workspace is currently tight. An associate dean, however, is working on moving the Grace MacInnis Room (AQ5119) – a meeting/seminar room currently shared by Humanities and Gender Studies – to Room 5118. New office spaces will be created in Room 5119 and perhaps even allow for a more comfortable “community” room for faculty, staff, and students. 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Workspace is improving with 4 new offices resulting from the conversion of AQ5119 (the former Grace MacInnis meeting room). AQ5118 has been repurposed to become both the department meeting room and a lounge area for students, faculty, and staff. Our graduate students are making good use of this room to share research and for their events. We have also been holding informal undergraduate group discussions. Once the 4 new offices are furnished and ready for use, we plan to convert a larger office into the mail/copy/lunch room. Because we use AQ5118 for meetings, we need to have fridge, coffee, etc. available in a separate room to avoid disrupting meetings. The added offices should finally put us in a position where only SIs and TAs occasionally share office space, but CFLs have their own dedicated office without being asked to share. The new meeting room has significantly improved the departmental interactions among faculty, and between faculty, staff, and students. We are hoping to add a permanent AV setup to the room so that we don't have to continue to request AV for presentations and events.

Educational Goals – Assessment Plans

Reflection upon the current strengths and realities of the department, as well as the nature of the Humanities as a discipline, have required us to adjust the goals and revise the data sources used to assess how the department is working towards achieving those goals.

The goals initially listed are met on a course-by-course basis, and at the appropriate lower-division or upper-division level. We are largely a service department (we currently have fewer than a dozen majors and a handful of minors), and, in this role, we have been very successful at helping many students of various departments fulfill B-HUM and W requirements. Our purpose, of course, exceeds this pragmatic reason for our existence, and students find in our courses a deeper meaning they may or may not have known they were seeking, as well as a space to inquire into and engage with life's great questions; they develop curiosity for the working of the world and the human beings and other creatures that populate it. This has led us to want to revise the data sources listed and, while keeping the course-level goals, set an additional department-level goal.

Revision 1. We have found that the initial ways set forth to assess these goals require some adjustment. The proposed HUM101W non-credit multiple-choice survey, for example, runs the risk of reducing the knowledge to be acquired to a list of canonical works and is not in line with the department's increasing focus on global humanities (as in the recent Five Year Plan) that denies the possibility of such a reductive survey. We can achieve the most important reason for having this survey (introducing students to a variety of key works in the Humanities) through balanced course offerings instead. This alternative approach prevents us from reinforcing a Eurocentric idea of the Humanities through a reductive list of key authors and texts tested in a multiple-choice survey. In our Five Year Plan, we are adamant about our efforts toward a more inclusive and more truly global approach to Humanities content. We have already made curriculum changes (course titles and content) to allow for a more geographically balanced course offering.

Revision 2. The second major data source suggested to assess most goals was the 400-level final paper. Because of the low number of majors and, therefore, the general lack of offering of 400-level courses, this data source also requires adjustment. Because very few of the many students who pass through our Humanities courses often to fulfill a B-HUM and/or W requirement, the 400-level paper is not the appropriate measure for our educational goals. Due to the small number of majors in our department, faculty have the luxury of following their development closely and tailoring the expected outcomes to the student's needs: this may, for example, be preparing them for graduate programs in a humanistic discipline.

Added Department-Level Goal. The main educational goal of the department as a whole, however, is not and should not be to prepare students for graduate school in a humanities program, but to prepare them to be responsible, inquisitive, and aware citizens. Each course should contribute to this to some degree. We have started working towards this by increasing experiential learning in the curriculum, as well as by increasing such opportunities outside of the formal curriculum. Additionally, we are seeking to build a stronger departmental community at the different levels of instruction (undergraduate and graduate), and between undergrads, grad students, and faculty to create a variety of forums for further informal learning. We are measuring our success through recent initiatives such as the revival of the graduate student caucus, initial meetings of the undergraduate student union, and a series graduate student-led lunchtime meetings for all department members and guests (funded by a Faculty Inquiry Grant focused on improving the Student Learning Experience). We are using our recently renovated and dedicated Grace MacInnis meeting room to house these forums. The increased liveliness of our hallway and meeting room are a sign that we are making progress on these fronts. The many opportunities to meet with peers and members at different stages in the department offers students greater opportunities to discuss the knowledge gained in their Humanities and other courses. Additionally, an increased commitment to maximizing the potential of our connection with the Institute for the Humanities at the Harbour Centre campus offers students even more opportunities to explore the present-day relevance of certain theories studied in their courses.

We have started making changes we would like to see reflected in a large number of Humanities courses in our entry course, HUM101W. HUM101W deals explicitly with exploring the purpose of a Humanities education in relation to pressing global issues. It sets the tone of an inquiry-based approach for other Humanities courses. In this course, students learn how to perform a peer review of each other's essay; this fosters an environment of discussion of ideas and turns the individual essay into a topic for discussion that goes beyond the conversation between the individual student and the instructor. We see this as the start of building a community of curious learners. In terms of experiential learning, one assignment asks students to attend an event in the community (a public lecture, a community dialogue, a film screening, an art exhibit, etc.) and write about their experience. Encouraging this kind of community participation and making it a part of the curriculum allows the instructor to tap into the cultural resources available in the Lower Mainland, as well as giving students the freedom to explore something of their own interest, and discover how some questions central to the study of the Humanities pertain to this event. This, in turn, encourages students to seek out discussions and debates that are happening in their community and to become active participants. We see this as an important way to encourage participation in civil society and to acquire an awareness and appreciation for intellectual and cultural engagement beyond their university years.

Incorporating similar initiatives in the majority of our courses would bring us closer to achieving our aim of activating and cultivating in our students a desire for life-long learning and instil the value of inquiry and (self-)reflection on current and historical events. These goals require a far-reaching type of formative assessment that does not end at graduation and will preoccupy us as we move toward the end of this external review cycle.
